Swastika Night: Burdekin, Katharine, Patai, Daphne ... Along with Brave New World and We, Katharine Burdekin's Swastika Night is often hailed a precursor to Orwell's earth-shattering work of dystopian fiction, 1984. While 1984 is probably a better story (for story's sake, with deeper, more well-rounded characters), it has one weakness; it is largely a justification of the idea that a society so twisted when compared with our own might survive. Swastika Night by Katharine Burdekin - Goodreads Katharine Burdekin was a British novelist who wrote speculative fiction dealing with political, social, and spiritual issues. She was the sister of Rowena Cade, creator of the Minack Theatre in Cornwall. Katharine Burdekin (Author of Swastika Night) In Proud Man Burdekin defines a soldier as a 'killing male', and in Swastika Night she continues the attack on militarism through Alfred's opposition to the ideology of Nazism. He realises that violence, brutality and physical courage can never make 'a man', but only ageless boys. To be a man, in his view, requires a soul.
